From The Texas Observer...correlations between trauma that happens to adolescent boys, the biological damage it does to their brains, how that altered physiology leads to violent behavior in their adult lives and their ultimate journeys to death row.

Male children who are traumatized experience physical changes to their brains that make violence a common response to similar experiences later in life.

Clearly not everyone who experiences a violent or abusive childhood goes on to commit heinous crimes.

But what is glaringly apparent is that most of those who find themselves in prison for violent crimes have had some kind of trauma in childhood or adolescence.

The presence of pathological family interactions in the histories of capital murderers is consistent with an extensive body of research demonstrating the role of disrupted attachment and disturbed family relationships in the etiology of violence.
